Course Description:

This course introduces and critically examines dominant approaches to understanding human interconnection at a global scale and provides an interdisciplinary overview of various trends attributed to globalization.

Learning Outcomes:

This course asks students to think critically about how global scale dynamics shape the context in which humans live their lives, solve problems, and seek change. To this end, we will study varied and contrasting approaches to understanding globalization, paying particular attention to the assumptions each makes about social, economic, political and cultural life. Students will learn to distinguish among these different approaches to understanding globalization, different definitions of globalization, and to identify the strengths and weaknesses of each.

Class discussions sparked by our course readings, lecture materials, films and your independent research projects give students a chance to practice how to engage ideas, arguments and case studies analytically. The written assignment provides experience with text-based research at the university level, and written feedback will assist you in refining and developing your skills as an analyst.

Textbooks and Course Materials:

Each week you will complete a set of assigned readings and consider those readings in relation to some analytical questions. The weekly reading assignment pages on OWL (see left hand menu) will include a guide to reading selections, some of the readings and in some weeks links to videos to watch. You can expect to read 20-30 pages per week for this course.

In addition to these journal articles and films, we are also reading each of those books which you can purchase via the Western Bookstore or from the publisher.

Bauman, Zygmunt and Carlo Bordoni. 2014. State of Crisis. Boston, Massachusetts: Polity. (You can purchase the electronic version of this book from the Western Bookstore).

Hardt, Michael and Antonio Negri. 2012. Declaration. Allen, Texas: Argo Navis Publishing.
