Course Description:

This course surveys and investigates recent and contemporary efforts to critically understand human subjectivity and agency in the power relations in which these things are realised. Students will examine theories and analyses of subjectivity and subjectification in terms of material conditions, language and symbolic economies, ideology, bodies, difference, and domination.

Learning Outcomes:

social subjectivity and agency. 'Class' will be a vital component in these. How are subjectivities and political and socio-cultural projects influenced by them?

- role of culture – i.e., forms and practices of consciousness, e.g. common sense, ideology, moral norms – in politics.

- social relations of power – race, gender and class analysis.

Textbooks and Course Materials:

Most of course material will be available online.
