Course Description:

One way of thinking about the philosophy associated with Judaism is to see it as involving an attempt to provide a reasoned defence for certain central religious practices and beliefs. In this course, the focus will be on historical defences of some kinds of ritual observance ethical conduct beliefs concerning the nature of the universe beliefs concerning the nature of human beings beliefs regarding the nature and existence of an everlasting supreme being thought to be the creator and ruler of everything.

In 2021, the course will cover both less and more than its official title indicates. It will start not with the very beginnings in Jewish philosophy, but with early Jewish philosophical writing of the medieval period, which had a profound effect on the nature of a kind of Jewish religious thinking that remains influential today. Most of the course will be given over to the original presentation during the medieval periods of arguments offered on behalf of particular religious ideas. A wide range of views will be considered, but one philosopher more than any other will be focused upon – the great 12th century figure Maimonides (the Rambam – 1138 CE - 1204 CE). The course will also extend beyond the Renaissance to include the early modern philosopher Baruch Spinoza (1632 CE-1677 CE) – certainly the greatest Jewish philosopher in the Western philosophical tradition.

Learning Outcomes:

The aim of the course will be to familiarize students with unfamiliar styles of philosophical argument, and to enable students to set these styles of argument in their differing historical contexts, so that they themselves can develop reasoned assessments of the strengths and weaknesses of competing philosophical views of a certain kind of religious life and thought.
