Course Description:

This course will introduce students to the political, social, and economic institutions of the modern Middle East. We will examine key themes such as political systems (i.e., regime-types), social and political culture, economic structures and outcomes, and state-society relations. We will also assess the role of key actors such as governments, non-governmental groups, and individual citizens. In this sense, the course will provide a comparative approach to the domestic and regional politics of the Middle East. We will begin by outlining general approaches and challenges to understanding the region so that we have the tools to ask relevant questions such as: What explains the persistence of authoritarianism in the region? Why did the Arab Spring produce mass protests (and changes) in some countries, but not others? How does religion influence and shape government and society in the countries of the Middle East? These questions will be explored in weekly seminars by surveying the political, social, and economic institutions of various countries in the region.

Learning Outcomes:

Identify and understand the geographical and historical place of the modern Middle East;

Demonstrate knowledge of the political, social, and economic institutions of countries in the Middle East;

Develop an understanding of the relationship between religion and politics and how these two ideas impact society in the Middle East;

Ask questions and evaluate possible solutions by using core concepts, theories, and methods related to studying the politics of the Middle East;

Synthesize and evaluate information from scholarly literature and engage with the ideas and arguments from the literature;

Develop the ability to critically assess ideas and information and to clearly communicate your knowledge in written and oral form; and

Improve organizational, time management, research, and analytical skills through independent and group work.

Textbooks and Course Materials:

The required readings (articles and book chapters) will be made available on the course website through OWL. (No cost to students.)
